THE GAZETTE.

THURSDAY MORNING, JUNE 24, 1858

In the last Quarterly Review, under the head of "Public Speaking." there is an excellent article on this subject, founded upon an address delivered by Lord Stanhope to the University of Aberdeen. The reviewer tells us that Lord Stanbope distinctly told the students that nothing great was to be accomplished without labor, and that there was neously, without the assistance of labor or study. Even where the soil was richest, the most careful culture is necessary to develop its strength to its fullest extent. This sentiment but responds to one uttered by Carrau -the man, of all others, whose speecheread most like inspirations of the momentto the effect, that there is no inspiration in these days, and that those portions of his specches which looked most like brilliant impromptus, were precisely the very portions that were studied with the greatest intensity. Moore has told us with what labor the speech-

Of all other writers, poets are believed by the uninitiated, to be the least it debted to labor. The saying of Horace "the poet is born, not made" (' poeta manseitur non fit") has produced a vast deal of misapprehension. It may be true that no man can be a poet who does not inherit from nature what is commonly understood as the poetical faculty. Of that we know nothing. But this we do know, that there is no art upon the face of the earth more susceptible of improvement than the art of poetry. To be consinced of it, we need only examine, chronologically, the works of any great poet whatseever .-Shakspeare, Milton, Dryden, tried by this test, will all be found to have improved as they advanced. No poet ever made greater progress in poetry than Pope, although he would have us believe otherwise, for he says, that if they really "came unsought, it was a felicity which abandoned him when he got Stanbope says, in a conversation with him, he hooted at the very idea of inspiration; and Trelawney tells us that he labored incessantly in his vocation. From 1809 to 1824, (in tion commands the highest Medical skill of the which last year he died,) he published at least fifty thousand lines, a prodigious performance. Shakspeare, who is supposed to have been writing twenty-three years, published about sixty-eight thousand lines of dramatic blank verse. There is, besides, a vast deal of prose in all his dramas. Besides these, we have a large number of songs, all his sonnets, his Venus and Adonis, and his Rape of Lucrece. This also was a prodigious quantity, and although the players say, in their preface, that he never blotted anything, this by no means proves that he did'nt labor, but, only that he did not write the line down until he had perfected it in his own head. This process was also pursued by Burne, who never blotted anything at all, but who nevertheless composed with great labor. Milton worked day and night at Paradise Lost for six years, getting such friends as called to see him to write down the lines he had composed. To the best of our recollection, Paradise Lost centains about ten thousand five bundred lines, so that Milton composed while at work on it, about 1750 lines a year, or, less than five a day, on an average. What labor, what a work, and lasting reputation, are, in general, as laborious as successful poets. Pascal wrote over NESS, of all kinds, from the fine quill work his Provincial Letters many times; Buffon copied one of his works over eleven times before he sent it to the press; Burke generally sent the third or fourth draught of his pamphlets to the press, and Sterne was employed for six months in perfecting a very small volume. But there is nothing which requires more study, or which is more certain of attainment, where the proper amount of study has been employed, than public speaking -Anybody, with good parts, and without impediment in utterance, can speak, if he will work hard enough. Nobody ever did, or ever will, or ever can, make a first-class as represented. speaker without labor. Good spouters they may make-taking speeches they may deliv But they will always want depth where

As your sons advance towards manhood, cease as far as possible meeting their faults exterior rather exhibit a loving interest in you win them away from what is wrong, coarse, unamiable or evil. At this age your power over them for good will lie mainly in your power to inspire them with the tenderest filial regard. If you put on a harsh manner you will surely repel, and lose your influence at a time when more, perhaps, than at any other period in their lives, they need to be held close to you by cords of the tenderest affection. Encourage them to give you their fullest confidence. In their little trials, disappointments and strifes, offer them your sympathy, and lift them above their weakness-not by making them conscious, to mortification, of their imperfections, but by inspiring them with true manly sentiments. -A wise, loving mother is a your g man's palladium of safety. The thought of her is a sphere of protection surrounding him all the day, and keeping his mind pure amid a thousand allurements to vice. Be very careful Daniel F. Witmer, to do nothing that will make your son's Benjamin Barton, thought of you oppressive or repellant. Oh; Elisha J. Miller. let your image ever lie in sunshine on his heart! So shall your love hold him back in the hour of temptation with chains of gold.
